Rembrandt Etching "The Three Crosses" Brought 88 .-500 at Evening Sale.

WIDENER IS A BUYER

In both sessions of the sale of the Gen. Brayton Ives collection of prints vesterday in the galleries of the Amercan Art Association the prices reached figures unprecedented in this country. A Meryon etching brought $3,100 at the afternoon session and the great Rembrandt etching, "Three Crosses," seld for $8,500 in the evening.

As at all the other sessions of this memorable auction all of the art dealers in town were present and many prominent collectors from all parts of the country were in attendance. Dismay was seen on some faces as these unheard of prices for engravings were reached and elation was depicted upon others. As a rule it was upon the faces of the dealers that the clation was visible, for it was the general opinion among the experts that the enthusiasm aroused by Gen. Ives's remarkable coltion would widen greatly the interest

This print, undoubtedly one of his masterpieces, was etched after Rembrandt's fiftieth year had passed and is remarkable for the breadth and vigor of the handling. It is printed upon vellum which now has a rich ivory tone and it is rated by some as being even finer than the famous impression from this plate in the British Museum. from this plate in the British Museum. The price, $8,500, is almost twice the previous Rembrandt record, the $4,500 paid for "The Hundred Guilders" print

Col. William Rockhill Nelson was one of the great figures of American journalism. In the section or the country in which the influence of his newspaper, the Kansas City Star, radiated, Col. Nelson enjoyed the fame of a Greeley or a Dana.

This repute was due not altogether to the solid ability which made the Star a forceful and successful newspaper, but to the sterling independence and un-affected simplicity which were cardinal traits of Col. Nelson's character.

It was characteristic of him that he never sought or desired preferment at the hands of the Government, that he never asked for himself or any one else any political place and that he preferred his occupation and the discharge of his duties as the editor of the Star to any other distinction that the world had to offer.

He encouraged the saying that "the His encouraged the saying that the star is Nelson's and Nelson is the star. His personality was reflected constantly and accurately in the columns of his newspaper. Through it he fought his personal battles, aided his personal prejudices and lauded his personal friends. The newspaper career of Nelson heart when he was 22 years old and son began when he was 39 years old, and he was both editor and proprietor from the moment of his entry into the pro-
